LEAVE OF TICKET MAN.

A Young Railroadman Arrested for Embezzlement of $400

A telegram was received from Chariton Wednesday evening, notifying the officers to arrest a young man named L. A. Gow, who has been in the employ of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railway at that place.

The man wanted was soon found and arrested by Officer Edgar, and on the evening train was taken back to Chariton by Officer Cusick. It appears that Gow has been ticket agent there, and that there is $400 of the company's money which is unaccounted for. He took his arrest quite easy, and claimed to be a good fellow, but what he could explain satisfactory. He is about twenty-one years of age, and has borne a good reputation and is respectfully connected.

True to her Trust

Too much can be said of the ever faithful wife and mother, constantly watching and caring for her dear ones, never neglecting a single duty in their behalf. When they are assailed by disease, and the system should have a thorough cleansing, the stomach and bowels regulated, blood purified, and malarial poison exterminated, she must know that the Electric Bitters are the only sure remedy. They are the best and purest medicine in the world and only cost fifty cents. Sold by C. F. Goodman.

MEMENTOES IN HAIR.

A True Story of a Young Man Who Had Trout Flies Made of His Many Fair Ones' Locks.

Philadelphia Press.

"Trinkets made of human hair will always be popular and fashionable as long as love and affection have a proper place in the breast of humanity," was the remark yesterday of a jeweller whose energies are entirely occupied in the manufacture of hair mementoes and keep-sakes.

"Lovers are your best customers, I suppose," he was asked.

"By no means. My principal business is confined to filling rings, or lockets, or brooches, with the hair of dead relatives or friends. Hair can be so easily preserved in the form of a trinket, and as it is something that once formed part of the deceased person, it cannot fail to keep green the memory of its natural possessor."

Lockets are the most popular trinkets. The hair deposited between the glass is constantly in view, and is less likely to suffer from damage than in any other way. In the shape of a ring or a bracelet it is likely to become frayed or coated with dust, and by degrees must decay. It probably lasts its time, however. Few people take any particular pleasure of being the possessor of hair alleged to have grown on the head of a grandmother or a great-ant. Husbands when they first marry are fond of having long neck-chains made out of the tresses of their wives, and I have had young wives bring me locks of their husbands' whiskers and beards to enclose in lockets or brooches. But that sort of thing soon dies out after a year or two of matrimony. I have frequently been filled with a child's hair, a trinket which formerly contained a portion of the hirsute appendages of the husband.

"Lovers are a little coy at parting, even for a few days, with the precious gift of the beloved darling's curl. They are afraid the much-cherished hair may be substituted for somebody else's lockets, and ask you any number of anxious questions as to the possibility of loss or mistake. I have even bravely submitted to the query as to whether my store was insured, or not, and have submitted my policies in testimony of the fact. They don't stop to think that an insurance policy would not save the tresses if a fire did occur."

"When the desired article of jewelry is finished and handed to the customer it is always received with a glimmering suspicion that it may not be the right hair. I suppose you know that hair is considered to be an unlucky keepsake between lovers. I begin to believe that there is a good deal of truth in the superstition, for I know of many articles of jewelry which I have filled more than half a dozen times with different persons' hair."

"A most extraordinary story of trout flies made out of human hair was related to me some time ago by a friend of mine, who is a manufacturer of sportmen's materials," continued the jeweller, while an amused smile played over his features. "There used to be a gay young fellow in this city who made love to every young girl he came across. He must have been rather successful, for he always managed to secure a lock of hair from each of his conquests. This young man had another equally strong passion—trout fishing. He loved to fish for the speckled beauties of the brook and river on the many beautiful maidens among whom he divided the treasures of his heart."

An idea struck him; he would construct out of each lock of hair he possessed. He took his collection of silky locks, tokens gleaned from perfumed peaches to the manufacturer of sportmen's materials and requested him to make the desired flies. When finished he placed them in his fishing pocket-book, each one attached to a card with the name of the girl and the date of the gift. His subsequent fishing was a long dream of romance. Even in their broiled state the trout had a halo of memory around them which gave them a flavor for which Lucullus would have forfeited an empire. He brought every conceivable shade, color and kind of hair to be made into flies; black, light and dark brown, gray, white, golden, yellow, auburn and red, curly, wavy, straight, in less than three years my friend made him 150 trout flies, which would be at the rate of a new girl every week. He was asked one day which colored flies he preferred. In reply he said red flies were preferable to any of the others, and that in future he intended to confine his attentions to young ladies whose hair was tinged with flame-like hues. In proof of this he married a girl with red hair, and had ten flies constructed out of one of her tresses. For some little time after his nuptials, his heart remained true to his fiery-polled bride and his red-haired flies. One day, however, he brought my friend a lock of hair of a far deeper hue of red, and instructed him to make two flies, as he found the fish would no longer bite at his wife's hair. His better half discovered the change of bait and began to smell a rat. To make matters worse, he one day went to his office leaving the key of his private desk at home in the lock. The lady examined the premises and discovered the album of flies to which he had only the previous day added his latest conquest. The wife returned to her mother that very morning, instituted proceedings for a divorce and gained her suit, the fly book being produced as evidence in court. If you search the court records you will find full confirmation of what I have just told you."

Ancient and Modern Egypt.

The ancient Egypt was reckoned in its best days to contain a population of 15,000,000, and it was the richest and most prosperous monarchy in the world before Rome came to the front. Its cities rivaled Babylon and Nineveh in their days and when Amru took Alexandria it contained over 600,000 inhabitants and the grandest library collection in the world. The modern Egypt, though possessing none of the ancient grandeur, is still a country far from despicable in resources and population. Egypt proper, from the cascades of the Nile to the sea, contains about 6,000 square miles of cultivable and irrigable land in the Nile valley, and a population of 5,500,000. This is less than the area of Massachusetts, and not much above the population of the state of New York. But the productive quality of the land is such that it might serve to support 20,000,000. The annual exports to Great Britain alone ten years ago amounted to $82,250,000, while the imports from Great Britain to Egypt were but $36,000,000, showing a heavy balance of trade in favor of Egypt. Since the opening of the Suez canal exports to England have declined to less than $40,000,000, and the imports to less than $12,000,000. The valley of the lower Nile is not all of Egypt, though it is all that is vital. The khedive rules over a region on the upper Nile covering an area of 1,500,000 square miles, and embracing a harbor of population of 10,000,000. This has been acquired by conquest since 1873, and includes Nubia and Darfur. Nubia is that country which the ancients called Ethiopia. These conquests may be made valuable by the construction of railways, but that will require European capital. The present dynasty was founded by the usurper, Mehemet Ali. He was appointed pasha, or governor, by the sultan of Turkey in 1806, and five years after he compelled his master to make him viceroy. This title was continued through the descendants of Mehemet Ali down to the fifth, Ismail, who, in 1869, received the title of khedive-el-Misr, which means king. The condition of this promotion was that the khedive should pay an annual tribute of $3,000,000 to the sultan, the former tribute being but $1,800,000. This, of course, is a heavy tax on the people. The allowance for the support of the khedive, or king, is $750,000 a year, and for his relatives $600,000. But the late khedive, Ismail, contracted private debts amounting to more than $40,000,000 and otherwise so wasted the substance of the country that in 1879, when France and England, for the protection of their people who held Egyptian securities, appointed each an officer to control and regulate the finances of Egypt. They found an aggregate of public and private debt amounting to $450,000,000. Ismail was deposed and his son Tewfik, the present khedive, became his successor. These financial complications led to present difficulties; those and the Mohammedan hatred of Christians and foreigners. The rapid decline of Egyptian trade with England, formerly her best customer, is attributed to the Suez canal, which enables England to trade on better terms with India and her Oriental possessions. And this fact is the secret of the aversion of the Egyptians to the canal and their earnest purpose to destroy it if they can.

SEA SERPENT - HAT BARKED.

Chasing "Poor Trustworthy Persons" Who "Saw Its Black Hair and Big Horns."

N. York Sun.

MONUMENT BEACH, Mass., August 15.—Charles H. Pierce, Capt. David E. Glinet, H. E. Foulce and William Vaughan, of Hartford, Conn., four young men who have been camping along the shores of the bay, relate the following exciting story of their journey across from New Bedford to Wing's Neck light: "We left New Bedford yesterday at 1 o'clock p. m. in the yacht Jessie, accompanied by our sailing master, Captain Walter Briggs. When two miles off the south end of Bird island light, at the entrance of Buzzard bay, the company called our attention to a singular looking object about half a mile ahead and some points off our port bow. Our captain called it a sea horse. Again, he thought its movements in the water did not resemble those of any fish he had ever seen.

"We soon ascertained that whatever it was propelling itself at a fearful rate of speed through the water, making almost a straight line for our little craft. When within a few thousand feet of us it seemed to raise its immense body, or neck, some ten feet out of the water, and, at the same time, twenty feet in the rear, its tail was seen to raise up, and at times slash the water. At all once the fish seemed to shoot out of the water, and we were near the black buoy not far distant from Wing's Neck light, when looking back, to our horror and dismay, we observed the mysterious fish again making direct for our boat at a most rapid rate. When within twenty-five yards of our craft it partly disappeared, but in an instant was seen to shoot out of the water with a sort of humming or hissing sound, and with a distinct bark like that of a dog. Then it dove again and was lost to sight. The length of this mysterious fish was twenty-five or more feet. Its body was about two feet in circumference, decreasing regularly toward the point of the tail, which resembled the size of a child's wrist. Its color was a dark gray, but resembling that of the back of a crocodile. The belly was a bright yellow, with dark red spots scattered here and there, while its tail was covered with short, thick black hair. The head resembled that of a bulldog. Great flat ears were distinctly seen on the other side of its ugly jaws, while two extremely long feelers or horns protruded just over the ears. The eyes were sharp and fiery."

It is said that a similar creature was seen in the bay two years ago. The members of the party are all trustworthy persons, and vouch for the truth of the narrative.
